

tools of the trade

Maxine Ferris, "TT" editor
Michigan State University

Planning and Developing Community Health Services

Planning and Developing Community Health Services. Carol C. Riddick and Sam M. Cordes. University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 1976. $6.00.

This nine-lesson correspondence course was developed by two Penn State researchers and is directed to those who are interested or involved in community health decision-making activities.

The course provides practical information and strategies in identifying and resolving community health problems and inadequacies.

Lessons present an overview of health issues and focus on such topics as: measuring community health status, factors affecting health, defining health care shortages, planning and developing community health services, and evaluating health services.

This course can assist decision makers in making useful, informed, and appropriate contributions toward increasing the level of health in their communities. Community leaders, elected and appointed officials, ad hoc citizen and community service groups, as well as Extension workers, would find this course useful.

Purchase orders should be sent to William H. Folwell, 104 Ag Administration Building, University Park, PA 16802.

Donna W. Manczak